Only 7 in 4,000 Die

Of Battle Injuries

Sulfa Drugs Credited With

Main Role in Recovery.

WASHINGTON, — Of 4,000 land, sea and air casualties treated in the South Pacific and Australia by the navy, only seven died, establishing a record-low mortality of 0.18 per cent, the navy's bureau of medicine and survey revealed.

Lieutenant Charles Crile Jr., who is the son of the famed Cleveland surgeon who died early this year, and who is attached to the mobile hospital at Auckland, New Zealand, submitted the report to the navy in conjunction with a group of medical officers aboard a hospital ship in the South Pacific Islands war zone.

Speedy removal of the wounded from battle areas and excellent medical care, including the use of the sulfa drugs, were credited by these authorities with assuring the recovery of the men, many of whom were badly wounded.

The casualties represented almost every type of injury, including those resulting from machine-gun and rifle bullets, shell fragments, severe burns, skull fractures, penetrations of the chest and abdomen as a result of the chest and abdomen as a result of injuries sustained in the campaign for the island of Iwo Jima.

In most cases the danger of the injuries was averted by the use of the mobile hospital to the hospital ship. About 100,000 men were treated in the mobile hospital to the hospital ship. About 100,000 men were treated in the
